

In India, Protests Met a Goal, but the Pro

As the protests in India continued, the government's response was to send in the police. The police used force to break up the protests, and many people were injured. The government also arrested several people who were involved in the protests. The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests. The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests.

The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests. The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests.

The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests. The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests.

The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests. The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests.

Protesters in India, some sitting on the ground and others standing, during a demonstration.

The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests. The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests.

The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests. The protests were a response to the government's policies, and the government's response was to use force to break up the protests.